an impact on this problem area. These classes could be composed somewhat by the existing curriculum. The suggestive approximate length might be a month, allowing the student to accommodate three or four such classes during the course of a semester. The longer intensive day period and the shorter number of weeks permits individuals a greater range to adapt work schedule. The concern of mid-semester drops would be significantly reduced by this while allowing the student to complete their program as their time permits. The additional incentive provided by an Associate of Science degree might well be extended to some of the vocational study programs.

On a finishing note, the area of advertising representation is one we might pay attention to. We are essentially in competition with the advertising campaigns of private institutions who have devoted accounts of considerable size to this end. However, we do have the option which we can exploit in unity with all or most of California’s other community colleges. We have an established statewide network through which we can promote by cooperative agenda community colleges to be the best and most cost effective way to obtain a high tech vocational education. We could illustrate this in conjunction with the advantages of a complete well-rounded education. Statewide advertising could develop to encompass network television, rather than the current use of obscure local advertising at off-peak times. There are successful examples of this tactic on both the state and national level of organization existing making the best use of shared limited budget dollars.
